Southwark Park Run

Saturday 7 December 2013

Dad and I missed last week's run as he made some excuse about having sore muscles. Personally I think it was either because it was Southwark Park's run number 13 or possibly because there was a very fast VM55 visiting from Exeter and Dad didn't want to look like a slug. This runner looked remarkably like Andy Catton, but when I suggested that it was him in disguise checking up on us, Dad said that it couldn't possibly be, as Andy is a VM60!

After the last run, we talked tactics. I suggested that we fit rotating blades to the buggy axles to stop runners overtaking us, but Dad thought that this was un-sportsman like and said that I had to stay awake instead. I agreed and so promised not to nod off this time. Dad also had promised after last week to 'practise' before this race, so he didn't have sore muscles again. He said that he had done 46 miles running over the last week. This must have been right as story times were really short and Dad was snoring long before I was asleep most nights.

Dad started really strongly this time and I kept guard on runners trying to sneak past us. We actually managed to pass a couple of runners as the 'practise' seemed to have worked. We steamed round the course at a great rate of knots, but on lap 3, I succumbed to the smile of the lady behind and let her pass us. I don't think Dad minded this one slip. He kept strong until the end and we finished 17th in 22:13, which was 44 seconds up on last time. I said to Dad that if he kept this up, we would have the World Record in the bag by summer. He wasn't convinced.
